It Pays to Forget

From a conversation with A. D. Cornish, a ~~simple~~ ^{Special} demonstrator whose friends call him "Able" ~~and like to be his friends~~, comes this item. It's about Mr. Eastman, as many of our best stories are.

An employee, unidentified by Mr. Cornish, approached Mr. Eastman and said that he hadn't had a raise for a long time, but he thought his work deserved one.

"How long?" Mr. Eastman asked.

"About four years," was the reply.

"Many others have had no change in wage for longer than that," Mr. Eastman replied. "What are you receiving now?" This question brought out the fact that the employee didn't know what he was receiving.

"We'll see about this," Mr. Eastman commented. "Anybody who is so interested in his work that he forgets what his salary is deserves consideration."
