

ANGELA RAISH

December 14, 1981

"I fight for the family. He's got to do things with his family. I don't want him to neglect them. And he'll do a better job if he feels he's done right by the people at home. It's important that he give his all when he's on the job. But who will remember him when he's gone? Only his family. They forget so quickly around here. They come in here now and ask about Helen--'that gray haired lady who sat here for so long, what was her name? She was here for 7 years and already people don't remember her. You make an imprint; but you are quickly forgotten. Your family is there when you leave. That's why I fight so hard to preserve time for the family."