Jack Flynt & 1960 Civil Rights Debate (March 10-23, 1960)

- "(it) can have but one end result--the inflaming of human emotions and the creation of strife, turmoil, bitterness and hatred where harmony and good will have prevailed and should prevail in the future."
- It has been put forward "for the basest of all motives, including selfishness, opportunism, exploitation and apparently a desire to gain political favor by turning the weapons of accusation, bitterness and vituperation against an entire section of the country."
- No violation of right to register and vote ever made known to him.
- "The lines of communication between the white citizens on the one hand and the Negro citizens on the other hand are gradually being destroyed by unwarranted meddling and interference by outsiders who care nothing for the Negro race and who in most instances know nothing whatever of actual conditions, but seem determined to exploit an entire race for base political motives that become absolutely inhumane in their application."
- "Further so-called civil rights legislation will be dangerous to constitutional government in the United States of America and will strike the deadliest of blows to the very structure of the government with which we have. I am convinced that the enactment of this legislation, with the accompanying devastation of constitutional processes and the further deterioration of good will between the white and Negro races in the U.S. would be more disastrous to our nation and our government and its process than if there should be catastrophic destruction of every material structure in our country."
- "Never in the history of this country has there been such an effort made to perpetuate a bad and evil thing as it has been undertaken since May 17, 1954, to implement the decision of the Supreme Court in the school cases."
